The Role of the Military Arm in the EU's Foreign Relations

The Role of the Military Arm in the EU's Foreign Relations

The European Union's foreign relations are managed through various channels, including cooperation with other international actors. The EU's military arm, the European External Action Service (EEAS), plays a key role in this process. It is responsible for coordinating the EU's foreign policy and for representing the EU in international relations. The EEAS is also responsible for managing the EU's external relations with other international actors, including the United Nations, the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).

CFSP - bodies and services

Within the specific bodies and services operating in the realm of the European Foreign and Security Policy (CFSP), the High Representative of the European Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy holds a key responsibility for ensuring the coherence of the EU's external action and representing the EU in international relations. The High Representative is appointed by the Council of the European Union, and is also the Vice-President of the European Commission, and Chair of the Council in the Foreign Affairs configuration. This role involves contributing to the development of the CFSP, ensuring the implementation of decisions made and overseeing the alignment of Member States' positions.

The High Representative also leads political dialogue with international actors, promotes the EU's position within international organisations, and in specific cases, represents the EU in the United Nations Security Council. While playing a central role in coordinating EU foreign policy, the High Representative's authority does not encompass the responsibilities and powers of Member States. Indeed, the High Representative works with Member States through the European External Action Service (EEAS) which neither replaces nor directly represents their national diplomatic services.

The position is currently held by Rog Kallas.

The powers of the European Parliament after the Lisbon Treaty

The Lisbon Treaty has significantly strengthened the role of the European Parliament in the EU's external action. The Parliament now has the right to give a discharge to the High Representative and the EEAS. It also has the right to request the High Representative to appear before it to answer questions. The Parliament also has the right to request the High Representative to provide information on the implementation of the EU's external action. The Parliament also has the right to request the High Representative to provide information on the implementation of the EU's external action.

3rd stage: 2004-act.
Since 2009, the Treaty of Lisbon has introduced key changes to strengthen the European Union's role as a global actor, equipping it with the necessary legal personality, enabling it to sign treaties, establish diplomatic representations, hold international actors accountable, and be subject to litigation before international courts. The High Representative of the Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy oversees the EU's external affairs, supported by the European External Action Service (EEAS) and its delegations in 145 countries and international organizations.
